

It Is Finished

This week's sermon from Hebrews 9:23-28 reminds us of the greatness of Christ's finished work. Under the Old Covenant, sacrifices had to be offered again and again, yet they could never fully accomplish what humanity truly needed. They pointed forward to something greater still to come. In Jesus, however, God brought His perfect plan to completion. Christ entered the true heavenly sanctuary, offered Himself once for all, and secured the salvation that only His blood could provide. His sacrifice was not temporary, repeated, or incomplete, but perfect, sufficient, and eternal.

Because the sacrifice of Christ is complete and all-sufficient, we can live with confidence, gratitude, and hope. We do not stand before God depending on the repeated efforts of men, but on the completed work of the Savior who bore sin on our behalf. He came first to deal with sin, and He will come again for those who eagerly wait for Him. As we worship together, may we be encouraged to trust fully in the Savior, rejoice in the New Covenant sealed by His blood, and prepare our hearts for eternity with faith, obedience, and joyful expectation. May this truth strengthen us not only in worship today, but also in the way we live throughout the week.
